The Marginalization of Women Artists

Historically, women faced immense barriers in pursuing careers as artists. These obstacles stemmed from societal expectations, limited access to formal training, and institutional biases. For centuries, art academies and galleries favored male artists, relegating women to the status of amateurs or decorative artisans rather than serious creators. Key issues include: - Restricted access to art education and ateliers - Societal norms discouraging women from professional pursuits - Limited opportunities to exhibit or sell artworks - The perception of women's art as secondary or lacking in seriousness Forgotten Women aims to challenge these narratives by unearthing stories of resilience and artistic brilliance.

Many faced: - Societal dismissiveness or outright hostility - Limited or no access to formal art institutions - Family obligations that conflicted with their careers - Lack of patronage or exhibition opportunities - Personal hardships, including health issues or trauma Despite these challenges, many persisted, producing work that challenged conventions and pushed artistic boundaries. Their stories serve as powerful testimonies to perseverance and passion.
