This article delves into the depiction of masculinity and gender in Greek cinema during this influential period, examining key themes, cinematic figures, and societal contexts that shaped these portrayals.

Historical and Cultural Context of Greek Cinema (1949-1967)

The Post-War Greek Society

Following the devastation of World War II and the subsequent Greek Civil War (1946–1949), Greek society grappled with instability, economic hardship, and a desire for stability and national identity. Traditional gender roles were reinforced as men were expected to be breadwinners and protectors of the family, while women were primarily seen as homemakers and caregivers. This societal backdrop deeply influenced the narratives and characters portrayed in Greek films.

The Rise of Commercial and Artistic Cinema

During the 1950s and early 1960s, Greek cinema saw a dichotomy between commercial popular films—often melodramatic and escapist—and the emerging art cinema movement that sought to address social realities more critically. Both strands depicted masculinity and gender differently, reflecting broader societal attitudes and aspirations.
